

Shouldn't Worry.
Worry brings worries, and the sensible girl should learn to avoid them in her home, and perhaps her business life. What good lies in wearing a long face and always thinking the worst will happen? "I'm so worried," is the cry of many people; they forget that they must worry others as well as themselves.

OVER THE HILL

Davy looked wistfully at the road which passed his aunt's house. He knew that it led to the village, for he had been there, and he could see it on the hill in the distance. He wondered if it ended there or if it kept on and on.

Perhaps if he should follow it a long way, it would take him where his pretty mamma was. His Aunt Kate wasn't pretty, and though she took good care of him, he didn't like her a bit. And there was his papa, who was a doctor and knew a whole lot, but a papa isn't like a mamma, somehow.

Boys always thought more of their mammas—at least boys of seven did. It was hard enough for a little boy not to have a mamma, but it was lots harder to have one and not know where she was.

For two years Davy had not seen his pretty mamma. He remembered vaguely that one morning he had asked for her, and his father, with a grave face, had told him that she couldn't see her any more. He knew that she wasn't dead, for he had heard his papa say once to Aunt Kate:

"It would not have been so hard if she had died."

He had decided then that his mamma had gone a long way off and left him and his papa. At that time they had lived in the city; but the next summer his papa had sent him to see his Aunt Kate and somehow he had stayed with her ever since. This year his father had moved into the country, and now had a large practice.

Davy was not happy. His aunt wouldn't let him do what he wanted to. It was a fancy of his that sometime he should find his pretty mamma if only Aunt Kate would allow him to look for her, and it seemed to him that if he should follow the road over the hill she would be waiting for him somewhere. But he had never had a chance to try until today, when his Aunt Kate was called to see a sick neighbor.

Then Davy quickly decided that he would follow the white road over the hill, until he had found his mamma. It was the hottest day of the season, and the sun beat mercilessly down on the little figure as it trudged bravely along. After awhile Davy grew very tired, but he still kept on. When he reached the steep hill which he had so often looked at from a distance he was nearly exhausted, but he only stopped to rest for a moment.

Then he started to climb it. It was hard work for the little chap, but finally he stood on the summit. Just a little way in the distance was a summer hotel. As he drew near he could see ladies in white linen fitting about, and gentlemen in flannels.

Davy's face was flushed and his throat parched, and although he was usually timid with strangers, he determined he would ask the lady who was sitting under a tree with a tall, dark man bending over her, for a drink of water.

They were talking in low tones and did not see Davy as he approached. He would wait a minute, he thought, before he spoke, for he did not want to interrupt them. The little boy had not seen the man who had ascended the hill a little behind him, and who now stood only a few feet away.

"Why do you follow me from place to place?" the lady was saying. Davy could not see her face, but somehow he was sure he would like her. He did not like the looks of the tall dark man at all.

"You know I—" began the man. But the lady, to silence him, put out her hand, and it looked so soft and white, that Davy wished she would rest it just one minute on his cheeks which were burning as they had never burned before.

"You spoiled my whole life," she went on. "Is that not enough? You made my husband believe that I was false to him. I tried to explain, but he would not listen to me. I had to leave my home—my little child. I came here so I could be near him, so that I might see him perhaps, sometimes—and now you follow me. Why do you persecute me so? You know I despise you."

There was a silence; and Davy stepped forward with uncertain steps. What made his head feel so queer? The lady rose suddenly to her feet, and as she saw Davy she gave a glad little cry. He took another step; then with a smile he fell unconscious into her outstretched arms. "Pretty mamma," he had murmured.

When Davy awoke to consciousness he was lying with his head on his mamma's lap, and his papa was there, too. The tall dark man had gone away.

"How do you feel now?" asked his papa. "I guess the heat was too much for you."

"Oh, I'm all right," said Davy. He would show his pretty mamma how brave he was, and he struggled to his feet, but as he tottered a little, his papa took him up in his arms. For a moment he felt ashamed that his mamma should see this, but when she smiled reassuringly and said it was the best way he felt at ease.

"Well, son, I guess we'd better be starting for home now," said his papa. An icy fear clutched the boy's heart. What if he and his papa were going alone. He couldn't bear that.

"You're coming, ain't you—pretty mamma?" he faltered.

His papa answered the question: "Why, son," he said in a glad voice, "of course she's coming."

VISITOR WAS SHERLOCK HOLMES

Marvelous Powers of Deduction That Astonished Storekeeper.

Though it had happened a long time before, the honest storekeeper still spoke of the occurrence with awe.

"It was this way," he said. "I was standing behind the counter in my store, thinking of nothing in particular, when a hawk-eyed gentleman walked in, followed by a quiet, unassuming chap.

"The hawk-eyed gentleman, after looking all about, turned to me.

"Do you—er—perhaps—sell—coffee?" he asked.

"Yes, sir."

"And—sugar?"

"Yes, sir."

"Nice raisins, too, I take it?"

"Yes, sir; we have a very superior line of raisins."

"He paused a while. Then, turning to me again:

"Cheese?"

"Yes, sir—good cheese."

"At that he beckoned to the quiet, unassuming chap and whispered in his ear:

"What do you make of it?"

"Not a thing."

"Watson—it's—a grocery store!"

"No!"

"I'm sure of it, Watson."

"Marvelous!"

"And signing to his companion to follow, the hawk-eyed gentleman stole away, with catlike tread, looking warily about him on all sides.

"Not until after he had gone did I realize who my distinguished visitor was."

BUILDING UP WORLD'S CITIES.

Growth of Centers of Population in Past Century.

The century just passed has witnessed an enormous multiplication of large cities and their rapid growth. In 1801 there were in all Europe but 22 cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants, of which only London and Paris had more than 500,000 and none reached 1,000,000. At present there are 160 cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants, 55 above 500,000 and seven of more than 1,000,000. In the entire world there are 13 cities of 1,000,000 or more inhabitants, including the European seven. M. De Foville, a French student of comparative statistics, attributes this unprecedented increase to the fact that the combined efforts of science, industry and invention have actually changed the face of the world. Chemistry, steam and electricity, railways and steamers, gold and credit have all appeared during this period and have given both to men and to affairs an impulse like the stroke of a magic wand.

Tender Tribute.

The author of the following gem is now being assiduously hunted for by all the Kansas newspapers: "Tenderly she laid the silent white form beside those that had gone before. She made no outcry, she did not weep. Such a moment was too precious to be spent in idle tears. But soon there came a time when it seemed as if nature must give way. She lifted her voice and cried loud and long. Her cries were taken up by others who were near and it echoed and re-echoed over the grounds. Then suddenly all was still. What was the use of it all? She would lay another egg to-morrow."—Kansas City Journal.

The Horse's Eyes and Ears.

Never buy a horse that shies without first having a veterinarian examine his eyes for cataract, as the tendency to shy is more often than not the result of defective vision. It may be only a small, bluish white speck to begin with, but even at that stage it impairs the sight, and it is incurable, says a writer in Country Life in America. Any one versed in equine character reading can learn much from the way a horse carries his ears. If they are always "pricked up" or carried toward, he may be partly blind or deaf, or both. If the ears are always laid back he is nervous or vicious, and in either case will give you trouble.

See Marmalade.

The analysis of a remarkable Japanese confection is reported in a recent bulletin of the College of Agriculture in Tokyo. This is no less than a "bee marmalade," said to be made of young wild bees and seasoned with soy. The results of the analysis show that the reputed composition of the sweetmeat is quite correct. The marmalade is said to be exported in air-tight tin cans. A French commentator remarks sarcastically that it will doubtless be welcomed at tables where they serve grilled locusts, as in Africa, or the Chinese dainty made of silkworm cocoons.

He Hits Back.

There had been a domestic spat at breakfast.

"You monster!" snapped the matron, who was always scolding. "You are not like my two former husbands. They were tender men."

"I never doubted that they were tender, Maria," ventured the weak man, "when you kept them in hot water all the time." And he just cleared the front porch two yards ahead of the rolling pin.

Cruel Candor.

"Was that glass Mrs. Shoddy gave the bride for a wedding present the real thing?" She declared it was.

"She told the truth. She got it at a marked down bargain sale, so whatever the material, it was really cut glass."

A Pretty Woman ALWAYS Has Suitors

And a good bargain, or a good opportunity, always finds takers!

WHEN SOMETHING OF REAL VALUE IS ADVERTISED—something unusual—you will not be the only one to see the ad., or to investigate the offer. But, if you are as alert in seeking a business advantage, or a bargain, as you were—or are—in affairs of the heart, you will win.

In fact, you will win if you have a tenth part of as much determination and enthusiasm in business as in playing your game with Dan Cupid.
